Inducted into RTC's Rail-Trail Hall of Fame in 2014, the Virginia Creeper National Recreation Trail offers scenic wonders ranging from dense forests, open fields, and lush waterways to railroad relics and delightful small towns. Visitors and residents alike love the length of the trail, its multiple access points, and the wide range of uses; in addition to walking and biking, horseback riding is permitted on the full length of the trail.

There are so many trestles along the route that each is numbered, with an identifying plaque at either end. Originally, there were more than 100 trestles spanning the region's web of picturesque creeks and rivers; 47 remain on the rail-trail today.

Many bike shops in Abingdon (the western terminus) and Damascus (roughly halfway through the trail) offer bike rentals and shuttles to the eastern terminus at the Whitetop Station trailhead (elevation 3,500') at the Virginia–North Carolina border. Most trail users opt for a shuttle from Abingdon or Damascus up to Whitetop Station and then hike or ride back down. Riders can also head to Abingdon directly from Damascus or, for a more challenging route, bike up from Abingdon or Damascus to Whitetop Station.

The first 17-mile stretch heading west from Whitetop to Damascus travels downhill through terrific scenery, from Christmas tree farms and grazing cattle to river views and deep forestland. It includes four access points, some of which are housed in restored railroad depots. Green Cove Station, the oldest station on the trail, was once a post office, general store, and cargo location. Today, it serves as a museum with artifacts on display—including original mailboxes—and frequently features photography exhibits and live music from local groups. The Appalachian Trail weaves on and off the Creeper as well.

Around the midpoint of the Creeper Trail, you'll reach Damascus. If you're continuing to Abingdon, you can enjoy this charming town's restaurants and shops before tackling the rest of the trail. From Damascus to trail's end in Abingdon, the constant downhill is exchanged for a flat grade with gentle rises and descents. It's not strenuous, but it is a change from the first section. This stretch also includes some of the trail's most beautiful river and farmland views.

On a ridgeline high above the South Fork of the Holston River, you'll emerge onto a bridge offering invigorating views of South Holston Lake below. As you continue toward Abingdon, you'll pass through cattle gates marking your entrance to the Creeper's expansive grazing meadows.

About half a mile from Abingdon is a public park with restrooms, picnic areas, and a water fountain. Just across the last bridge, you'll reach the Abingdon trailhead and the
