Billings Trail

Connecticut

Open in several disconnected segments, the Billings Trail is a dirt path that traverses a lovely scenic and wooded landscape outside metal gate off of Ashpotag Road, where limited parking is also available.

There is a small rail-trail segment located in Barbour Woods, just north of Norfolk off of Route 272, that offers connections to a larger system of trails within the woods. A third segment of the Billings Trail, known as the Tait section, lies south of Norfolk off of Grantville Road. This part of the trail runs alongside Smith Pond and the Mad River, offering up more chances for trail users to encounter local wildlife, from bullfrogs and salamanders to a variety of warblers. The trail comes to an end at Winchester Road, beyond which is private property.

Open in several disconnected segments, the Billings Trail is a dirt path that traverses a lovely scenic and wooded landscape outside Norfolk in northern Connecticut. Built on the abandoned railbed of the former Connecticut and Western Railroad, which ended service in 1939, the trail offers plenty of opportunities to explore the natural beauty of the area as it connects to a variety of other trails, all managed by the Norfolk Land Trust.

The first part of the trail, known as the Stoney Lonesome section, begins off of a small road on the outskirts of North Canaan. The trail takes users through a tranquil hardwood forest and past a small pond that has become a popular place for frogs to lay their eggs. Railroad buffs may also be interested in this section, as it was the site of a train wreck in May of 1882. This part of the Billings Trail ends at a
