powerhouse in the late 1800s. In the park, you can connect to the BMRR South Trail, which is part of a network of hiking and biking pathways throughout the 1,500-acre park.

The High Ore Line Trail is included in Birmingham's Jones Valley Trail network, which is part of the Red Rock Trail System, a developing 750-mile network of multiuse trails in Jefferson County. The Red Rock Trail System connects important destinations throughout the region such as Red Mountain Park, which—at 1,500 acres—is one of the largest urban parks in the country.

The High Ore Line Trail, which opened in 2016, is located in the southwestern outskirts of Birmingham, Alabama. The pathway offers a convenient and pleasant transportation option as it passes over several large roads, three active railroads, and Valley Creek. Enjoy the views of the water and the surrounding area from bridges along the route. For a majority of the route, trees surround the trail, making it a welcoming place to explore this part of the city.

In summer 2019, an extension was completed to connect the trail to Red Mountain Park, complete with a new park entrance on Venice Road. Be aware that there is a steep hill near the Red Mountain Park Venice Road entrance. The park's namesake mountain was the source of rich iron ore deposits that made the city an industrial
