Wilmington Riverwalk

Delaware

A gorgeous addition to the area's trail network, Wilmington Riverwalk (sometimes called the Christina River Walk) allows check out the visitor center, an essential stop for those interested in learning about the area's ecosystem and biodiversity.

From the education center, the route continues west via the Jack A. Markell Trail, starting with another picturesque boardwalk section built to allow trail users to explore the preserved wetlands with minimal disruption to the environment. That trail continues all the way into New Castle, allowing for a largely flat, seamless, and scenic journey between the two cities.

With ample benches, numerous trail amenities, beautiful native trees and flowers, and lovely views of the adjacent river, the Wilmington Riverwalk offers great outdoor recreation opportunities for residents and visitors alike.

A gorgeous addition to the area's trail network, Wilmington Riverwalk (sometimes called the Christina River Walk) allows pedestrians and cyclists to experience Wilmington's renovated urban development along the banks of the Christina River. The trail passes a variety of waterside restaurants and businesses, scenic viewing platforms, and the city's train station just south of downtown.

On the trail's southern end, you'll enjoy a breathtaking boardwalk section leading into the Russell W. Peterson Urban Wildlife Refuge. A statue of the marshy refuge's namesake, a former Delaware governor and prominent environmentalist, greets trail users at the beginning of the boardwalk section. The trail leads to the impressive DuPont Environmental Education Center, where you can
