The Mill Race Trail follows the former Pomeroy & Newark Railroad bed along the banks of the White Clay Creek. The trail's surface is a mix of packed dirt, woodchips and cinders. There is a steep section the first quarter mile of trail from the parking area to the Creek. Due to these conditions, the trail is likely best suited to walking and mountain biking.

Along the route, you'll see the concrete abutments of "Bridge 42" where the Pomeroy & Newark passenger train crashed into the icy, flooded White Clay Creek in 1904 and half a mile downstream look for the rocky remnants of an 18th century dam that powered a local mill. There are wooden benches placed along the east branch of White Clay Creek. The area is known for its rare native plants and the trees and plants have labels identifying
