Lincoln Prairie Trail

Illinois

While you're in the land of Lincoln, visit the Lincoln Prairie Trail to make the trip complete. Starting at the trailhead in northwest

One trail highlight is the stretch along Lake Taylorville and the South Fork Sangamon River on the north end of the route. At the time of this writing, the bridge over Flat Branch was closed; however, this closure doesn't detract too much from the end-to-end experience. As you approach Taylorville, the development patterns become more suburban, and the trail ends at 206 South Paw Paw Street, where the Lincoln Prairie Trails Conservancy recently built a complete trailhead facility including a rain shelter, accessible picnic table, and an eleven-space (including accessible spaces) concrete parking lot.

The City of Pana owns the trail. Upon completion of the new bridge over the Flat Branch (expected in 2020 or later), the City of Taylorville will own the portion from Paw Paw Street to the Owaneco city limits. Volunteers from the non-profit have been promoting trail use, enhancement and expansion since 2017, including doing asphalt repairs.

For updates on trail construction, maintenance and events and the work volunteers are doing to keep the trail in shape, check the Lincoln Prairie Trails Conservancy Facebook page.

While you're in the land of Lincoln, visit the Lincoln Prairie Trail to make the trip complete. Starting at the trailhead in northwest Pana, leisurely stroll along a paved trail that is nicely separated from the rural highway. The route offers a fairly flat and straight shot to Taylorville with a combination of tree-canopied sections and more open areas.

The trail skirts several active silos via on-road routes as it passes through Millersville and Owaneco, but these short diversions are well marked and located on very lightly traveled small-town roads. The trail is well woven into the local communities and surrounded by the region's many farms. Depending on the time of year, you can find corn, soybean, and sunflower fields for many miles.
