If you have a tendency to tootle along when you walk or bicycle, then consider taking the Hoodlebug Trail. You'll find many diversions in and around the college campus in the borough of Indiana and other trailside towns, or perhaps you'd prefer to loiter in the woods alongside Stoney Run or Two Lick Creek. You could pause at the trail's historical sites, or time your visit to coincide with September's annual Hoodlebug Festival in Homer City.

The 11.8-mile path is named for the self-propelled passenger coach that traveled the Indiana Branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad between Blairsville and Indiana. Known by the nickname Hoodlebug, it traveled the line until 1940, and the railway ceased to operate in 1977. The first section of trail opened in 2000. The majority of the path was resurfaced with paved asphalt in 2020, replacing the trail's former gravel-like tar and chip mixture and making it easier for road bikes and wheelchairs to navigate.

Although not hilly, the trail has steeper grades than most rail-trails. Indiana marks the trail's high point, and the path dips to Homer City and then climbs again to Graceton before terminating at Black Lick, the low point. An isolated 0.8-mile section, located farther south, runs adjacent to US 119 in Burrell Township. The Hoodlebug Trail connects with the 44.5-mile Ghost Town Trail in Black Lick. Both are part of the Trans Allegheny Trails system, comprising 13 rail-trails that stretch across west-central Pennsylvania.

Starting at the southern edge of the Indiana University of Pennsylvania campus, the trail heads south alongside Wayne Avenue, then beside US 119 south to Black Lick. Although it parallels busy highways, the trail is often screened by woodlands. A half-mile extension along the still-active rail line was added to the northern end of the trail, providing easier trail access into the heart of the university campus.

Just before you cross US 422 at 1.5 miles, you'll pass an A-frame church building on the right that used to be the Red Rooster, a rock-and-roll venue of the 1960s. At 3 miles, you'll pass the old Lucerne Mines coal-mining complex, which included ovens that created coke into the 1970s. Arriving in Homer City at 4.6 miles, at the trailhead on North Main Street you'll see the old depot site that houses a museum in a caboose. After you cross Yellow Creek, the cemetery (rumored to be haunted) to your right dates from the mid-1800s.

You'll pass through Graceton at 7.3 miles, followed quickly by Coral. Both had coke ovens to convert coal for use in the steel industry. To the right of the path, you'll likely see Homer City Generating Station's 1,216-foot tower, reportedly the tallest in the United States. The trail veers off along Lloyd Street at 8.9 miles, then crosses under US 119 and enters Saylor Park in Black Lick. Just before the park, you'll see slag piles left over
