Big Stonecoal Trail

West Virginia

In West Virginia's Monongahela National Forest, the Dolly Sods Wilderness features sweeping vistas, spruce and aspen groves,

The trail parallels Stonecoal Run for nearly its entire journey, crossing it three times before the stream empties into Red Creek. Just north of Breathed Mountain, gorgeous waterfalls await trail users. Here the aptly named Rocky Point Trail bears east, offering some lovely views of the canyon. Continue downhill on the Big Stonecoal Trail to reach its southern end at the Red Creek Trail along the larger waterway.

In West Virginia's Monongahela National Forest, the Dolly Sods Wilderness features sweeping vistas, spruce and aspen groves, beautiful meadows, beaver dams and rolling creeks. The area is also home to several intersecting trails, offering a selection of loop options for multi-day hikes of varying levels of difficulty.

Note, bikes are not allowed in the Dolly Sods Wilderness Area.

The Big Stonecoal Trail begins in the north at a junction with the Blackbird Knob Trail and Breathed Mountain Trail, which head northeast and southeast, respectively. The Big Stonecoal Trail instead extends south on an old logging railroad corridor that serviced the once-bustling timber industry in this area.
