Closure Notice: The Greenbrier River Trail is undergoing a significant bridge redecking project over the next two years. This will cause rolling closures heading north from MM 55.5, and will continue through November 2027. Please check with the Greenbrier River Trail Foundation for more current information.

The Greenbrier River Trail weaves a path of 77 miles through lush forest and rural small towns of West Virginia's Allegheny Highlands, along the longest undammed river in the eastern United States. Parts of the trail lack cell service due to a quiet zone created for a nearby radio telescope—compounding the feeling of remoteness here in the midst of the Appalachian Mountains. With 35 bridges and two tunnels, the state's longest rail-trail offers a serene and stunning natural retreat, earning acclaim in the Rail-Trail Hall of Fame, and as one of U.S.'s 52 Millennium Legacy Trails.

About the Route

The Greenbrier River Trail's northern endpoint is at Back Mountain Rd/WV 66 and Deer Creek Road, just outside Cass Scenic Railroad State Park. From Cass, the trail heads south for 9 miles, to the town of Clover Lick, which houses a restored railroad depot built in 1900 that once served the booming logging industry. 16 miles south of Cass, the serpentine route comes to the 500-foot-long Sharps Tunnel. Completed by the railway in 1900, the tunnel is immediately followed by a trestle bridge that crosses the river.

After winding further south, the trail becomes paved for a 4-mile stretch through Marlinton, the largest town on the trail, where users can find trail information and several cafés, grocery stores, bike shops, and overnight accommodations in town. Marlinton is also the site of the annual Roadkill Cookout in the fall. For those with more plain palates, the town of Seebert is 10 miles further south on the trail, and boasts a well-known ice-cream stop.

South of Seebert, the trail becomes even more remote, passing towns that are little more than names on a map. However, cell service becomes more prevalent. Another remnant of the railroad era emerges just north of Horrock, at the 402-foot-long Droop Mountain tunnel. Like with its northern counterpart, a light will prove useful inside the pitch-black tunnel. The trail continues south from the Droop Mountain Tunnel for about 29 miles, with campsites and other rest sites offering restrooms and drinking fountains throughout southern stretch of the trail.

Just north of the southern endpoint in North Caldwell, trail users can take a historic detour three-tenths of a mile north on Stone House Road, to see The Stone Manse, a historic home built in 1796. The Greenbrier River Trail's southern
