Barton Creek Greenbelt

Texas

Barton Creek Greenbelt is one of Austin's most popular trails, which runs for 7.6 miles through Barton Creek Wilderness Park

Barton Creek Greenbelt is one of Austin's most popular trails, which runs for 7.6 miles through Barton Creek Wilderness Park southwest of the city. The dirt trail, best suited for mountain bikes, is flanked in places with rock walls and follows the course of its namesake creek through lush greenery. At the east end, Zilker Park features dinosaurs hiding among the botanical gardens.

From the Barton Creek Greenbelt, hikers can also access footpaths that stray away from the main path into the hills but cyclists must remain on the main Greenbelt corridor. The trail is open from 5 a.m. to 10 p.m.

About the Route

Leaving off from the trail's eastern endpoint in Zilker

Park, which is considered Mile Marker 0, the trail heads west, entirely following Barton Creek. This trail end is also home to Barton Springs Pool, a natural spring water pool filled with cold water from the local springs, making it a perfect start, end, or return point for any trail users.

Although the trail is a narrow dirt track for nearly the entire route, there are several sections where the greenbelt is divided into individual hiking and mountain biking trails, including between mile markers 1.5-1.75, 2.5-3, and 3.75-4.

Other than Barton Springs Pool, other swimming holes along the trail include Campbell's Hole (MM .75) and Gus Fruh (MM 2.25).

Notable falls along the route, most prominent in the spring, include the Flats (MM .75), Twin Falls (MM 5), and Sculpture Falls (MM 6.25).

Climbing walls along the route include New Wall (MM 1.5), Gus Fruh (MM 2), Urban Assault Wall (MM 2.5), Kirk and Allvin's Wall (MM 3), Maggy's Wall (MM 3.5), and Beehive Wall (MM 4.25).

The westernmost endpoint of the trail is located at Camp Craft Rd., which offers limited on-street parking (paid).

Connections

At the eastern end of the trail, the Barton Creek Greenbelt connects to the Ann and Roy Butler Hike-and-Bike Trail.
