This segment of the historic Lewis and Clark Trail traverses cliffs perched above the Columbia River in the Oregon desert. The fairly flat trail, steep and sandy in sections, gathers the rural treasures of McNary Beach Park, the Columbia River, Hat Rock State Park, and Warehouse Beach Recreation Area. The sun bears down on the sagebrush, and you'll want to make sure to bring adequate water, sunscreen, and a hat. Hiking and horse travel are most common on the trail; mountain bikers will likely dismount through sandy and ungraded sections.

Umatilla is at the southern tip of the Interstate 82 bridge that crosses the vast Columbia River into Washington wine country, also home of the Lower Yakima Valley Pathway. Invisible are miles of the Oregon-Washington Railroad and Navigation Company (OWR&N) and the towns flooded by McNary Dam construction in 1953. Sacrificed to rescue the critical trade route of the mighty Columbia from the unrelenting Umatilla rapids, these ghosts now lie under the 64-mile-long Lake Wallula.

This OWR&N division of Union Pacific was rebuilt in a location less vulnerable to the previous years of rockfall and avalanches, which had shoved railcars into the river since the railroad was constructed in the late 1800s.

Starting from the grassy riverfront of McNary Beach Park, a flat trail climbs to a scenic, steep riverbank at 1 mile. Stay high at the fork. The path again flattens on the approach to Hat Rock State Park as stunning views appear of inlets, basalt formations, and cliff-top homes. Boats cruise by, and you can hear the metallic rustle of cheatgrass and bunchgrass. Eagles and hawks soar above.

Desert browns and yellows become bright green as you enter Hat Rock State Park, where willow trees and flowers encircle a pond enjoyed by geese and ducks. A bridge crosses the inlet to open desert trails. Hat Rock towers above the anglers waiting on the banks of the inlet and pond for steelhead and rainbow trout, walleye, and sturgeon.

You'll continue 1.6 miles past the east edge of the park on a relatively level railroad bed to end at Warehouse Beach Recreation Area. Explore all this sunny riverside park has to offer before heading to wine tastings on the Lower Yakima Valley Pathway. Note that only Hat Rock State Park allows pets.
