Holmes County, located in northeastern Ohio, is the heart of the state's Amish country. Visitors to this rural enclave will find meandering country roads and bucolic natural areas, as well as the scenic Holmes County Trail. The path was the first recreational trail in the country designed to accommodate Amish buggies, and throughout much of the route it is just as common to pass a horse-drawn buggy as it is to pass a cyclist or walker.

The trail is open in two disconnected segments. The northern section of the route stretches between Fredericksburg and Killbuck. The southern section stretches 7.3 miles between Gann (also known as Brinkhaven), at the border with Knox County, and Glenmont. Approximately 3 miles separate the two sections.

About the Route

The Holmes County Trail leads off from its northern endpoint in Fredericksburg and heads south through a mix of farmland and shaded streams before entering Holmesville. This northernmost 0.5 miles of the trail, which is actually in Wayne County, is also called the Salt Creek Trail. Holmesville is a quiet community, and the trail follows lightly trafficked community streets for about a mile here.

South of Holmesville, a smartly designed trail tunnel takes trail users underneath OH 38. This part of the trail passes through long stretches of picturesque swamplands. Here, wildlife abounds among the water and the trees. It's very likely to see turtles, snakes, or any number of bird species. Given the wet terrain, there are several stream crossings over old railroad bridges.

In Millersburg, trail users will find Hipp Station, a beautifully restored historical train depot, which serves as the trail's headquarters with a visitor center featuring wildlife displays, trail information, restrooms, vending machines, a covered picnic area, and a playground. While the trail will soon be connected, the trail continues along SR-520

While the trail will soon be connected, after the 3-mile gap, the trail picks back up at the Killbuck trailhead where trail users will find picnic tables and benches. The northern section of the trail, which is a paved route, has an adjacent path for equestrians and Amish Buggies for its entire 15.7-mile route; be sure to review the etiquette rules posted at the trailhead so trail users can share the trail safely with its myriad users.

The southern section of the trail travels between the small towns of Glenmont and Brinkhaven, with its southernmost endpoint just short of the business district of Brinkhaven.
