JF Gregory Park Trail

Georgia

J.F. Gregory Park is a 335-acre multi-use recreational area that once encompassed a thriving rice plantation and was subsequently beautiful park, and many different groups participated in its creation and maintenance. The local garden club, historical society, city planners, and private donors collaborated to develop historic landscaping, refurbish the Ford house, and construct the trails, birdwatching tower, pavilion, and wetlands center. In addition, a bridge and monument to veterans have been constructed.

Connections

The J.F. Gregory Park Trail is part of the Coastal Georgia Greenway, a planned trail network.

J.F. Gregory Park is a 335-acre multi-use recreational area that once encompassed a thriving rice plantation and was subsequently bought up by Henry Ford. Named for Ford's plantation foreman, the park was developed beginning in 1998.

About the Route

In addition to the 3-mile nature trail, today the park includes the Wetland Education Center, a birding trail with a tower, the restored Henry Ford home, a 10-acre lake, and a covered pavilion. In addition, you can fish, picnic, canoe, and play sports here; there are also fitness stations along the trail.
