The DuPage River Trail spans 49.3 miles across two counties: DuPage and Will. The trail is open in several disconnected segments mainly in parks and forest preserves beginning in Bartlett and traveling south through Naperville, Bolingbrook, Plainfield, and Shorewood.

About the Route

The DuPage River Trail is actually comprised of several individual trails, which together span an impressive nearly 50 miles through the Chicago suburbs. The northern spine of the trail is also called the West Branch DuPage River Trail as it travels south towards Naperville. At the south end of Naperville, the trail splits in two. The western section of the trail continues south as the DuPage

River Trail, while the eastern spur becomes the East Branch DuPage River Trail.

The western section is still under development and exists in many disconnected segments, although trail users may use on-street sections to continue their journey. Along its route the DuPage River Trail passes through numerous forest preserves owned by Will and DuPage counties, each worth exploring.
