Weber River Parkway

Utah

The Weber River Parkway begins about 100 yards south of the confluence of the Ogden and Weber rivers. It's a popular trail with the fur trapper who founded Ogden in the mid-19th century. Another attraction is Fort Buenaventura Park, built by Miles Goodyear himself. Today it offers a range of outdoor recreational amenities while replicating and/or preserving the sites historic structures.

As the trail crosses Parker Drive into Riverdale, the surrounding becomes much more residential. With the neighborhoods to the west and the railroads to the east, the river greenway feels like a pocket of tranquil beauty. Ogden is a town that has been shaped by the railroad, thanks to its position close to the Transcontinental Railroad's meeting point at Promontory Summit. In fact, the Southern Pacific Railroad donated a portion of the land on which the Weber River Parkway sits today.

The trail comes to an end on Cottonwood Drive in South Weber. As with the Ogden River Parkway and Bonneville Shoreline Trail, it forms part of the Centennial Trail, a planned 27-mile loop.

The Weber River Parkway begins about 100 yards south of the confluence of the Ogden and Weber rivers. It's a popular trail with visitors, tracing the eastern shore of the Weber River and the crossing over to the western bank. The mostly paved pathway (the 2 southern-most miles are gravel) remains in the greenbelt formed by the river, meaning that although it is in an urban area, it can sometimes feel much more remote. It's a relatively flat trail with few road crossings, and some pretty pedestrian bridges to carry trail users across the river.

The trail begins in West Haven, following the path of the river as it meanders along. Just after the river bend close to the railyards, the trail crosses over to the left bank of the river and the trail starts to head south. Along the way, trail users will pass the Miles Goodyear Park, named for
