Middlefork Savanna Trail

Illinois

The Middlefork Savanna Forest Preserve is a natural gem hidden in an high-income neighborhood of Lake Forest, Illinois. Those 600

the Bike Path for a while, before swiveling and heading south. A canopy of white oak shades travelers from direct sunlight, but the relief doesn't last all the way as the scenery opens up into meadows and wetlands. The trail criss-crosses the North Branch of the Chicago River. Take time to pause on the river crossings or at any of the ponds to see if you can spot Green Herons or Great Egrets, among the many other kinds of waterfowl.

About halfway through the meandering path is the Elawa Farm Foundation, an historic farm that serves as a neighborhood park and education center. There is also access to the adjacent neighborhoods at this point.

The trail continues south and terminates at Melody Road.

The Middlefork Savanna Forest Preserve is a natural gem hidden in an high-income neighborhood of Lake Forest, Illinois. Those 600 acres are home to perhaps the best-preserved example of the rare tallgrass savanna in Illinois. On top of that, there are a range of natural communities including woodlands, mesic and wet prairie, sedge meadow and marshes. This incredible ecological diversity means that the Middlefork Savanna accommodates many federally and state-protected species of flora and fauna. Birders especially are in for a treat here.

The Middlefork Savanna Trail traverses the preserve, and is open to joggers, cyclists, dog-walkers, snoeshoers in winter, and others seeking to explore this natural haven. The trail diverges from the North Shore Bike-path along US 176, near Ashford Drive. Users will parallel going west
