passes through Ray Schleih's Park and crosses quiet neighborhood streets on its way into Johnston. The trail runs just behind one of the suburban city's main drags, providing easy access to a number of popular local shops and restaurants. Leaving the rail corridor, the trail makes a short jog to the east and north, following a pleasant tree-lined route behind an elementary school and finally coming to an end at Northwest 62nd Avenue. Just a block away via the sidewalk, the sidepath Northwest 62nd Avenue Trail provides a not-quite-scenic but very useful connection to more of the city's area trails and greenways.

The Johnstons Interurban Trail, built on a corridor used by Iowa's Inter-Urban Railway from 1906 until 1948, provides an important connection for the area's top-notch trail system, which enables trail users to travel on paved paths from the heart of Des Moines into the northern suburb of Johnston.

The trail's southern end begins at Beaver Creek, where the Trestle to Trestle Trail provides access over the water and connects to further trails in Des Moines, Saylorville, and beyond. Heading north, the trail connects to the eastern terminus of the Beaver Creek Greenbelt Trail, which follows the creek deeper into the Beaver Creek Natural Resource Area, a scenic wooded reserve teeming with wildlife. The Johnstons Interurban Trail continues heading north, beginning a slow but steady ascent as it
